

SILK FILATURES

THE STEAM FILATURE IN CHINA: China's first attempt to spin cocoons according to the European system was made in 1873. There are now 207 steam filatures in the country. Every steam filature has buying stations in the interior, and purchase of the first crop of cocoons is generally made during May and the second crop of cocoons during June or July, each transaction lasting about seven days. The cocoons are brought to the stations by the peasants and are paid for in cash. When the purchases are concluded, the cocoons are spread out on a screen and kept in heaters many hours to kill the silk-worms.

When the cocoons arrive at the filature, the first operation is to take off the skin. "Peeling of Cocoons" this is called. After the peeling, the cocoons are passed on to the selection department, where they are selected and classified according to their color, quality and size. This is a very important section of the filature, as the quality of the finished article is dependent on the care taken in the sorting of cocoons. The cocoons are then sent to the reeling department and distributed to the reeling basins. With every two basins is provided a special basin in which the cocoons are first placed to soften the gums. They are also brushed. By this means broken ends and cocoon waste are separated and nothing remains but the fresh filament. The reeling girl handles the cocoons from this stage. She places them in a basin of hot water, the temperature of which should be 70 degrees C and after a little immersion, the fresh filament is taken off and hung on hooks. It is then twisted through a croisure on to the reel. The motion of the reels pulls the thread through the croisure, thus squeezing out its water content and agglutinating the filaments into a compact whole. If all the processes are carried out carefully, the yield is a raw silk that is cohesive, strong in elasticity and tenacity, and of high luster. As soon as a cocoon is exhausted a fresh filament must be thrown in so as to avoid such defects as fine ends and to give an even sized product. During the reeling the silk is constantly checked for size. At the end of the day's work, the silk is tested as to size and winding and inspected as to cleanliness and color, and if found satisfactory, is handed over to the packing girl, by whom the skeins are put into bundles, or "books." A bale of silk weighs a picul, or 133 1/3 lbs, and contains on an average fifteen bundles. It is estimated that 3.20 piculs of fresh cocoons make a picul of raw silk. Five to six piculs of dry cocoons are used.

There are other silks on the market in addition to steam filature raw silk. One is the Tsatlee or native reeled white silk. Fresh cocoons that are not bought by the steam filature owners are reeled by the natives on their primitive hand machines. The silk thus spun is very crude and is bought by brokers who sort and reel the silk into standard skeins. After selection the silk is offered for sale to foreign buyers.

There is also yellow raw silk, which is produced in the provinces of Hupeh, Szechwan and Shantung. Tussah silk is the commercial name given to raw silk produced from the wild silk-worms of Shantung. These wild silk-worms live on oak leaves and yield raw silk of a rather coarse kind. "Canton Silk" is the raw silk produced in the province of Kwangtung. The filature raw silk of Chekiang and Kiangsu is known as "China Steam Filature."—The Chinese Economic Bulletin.
